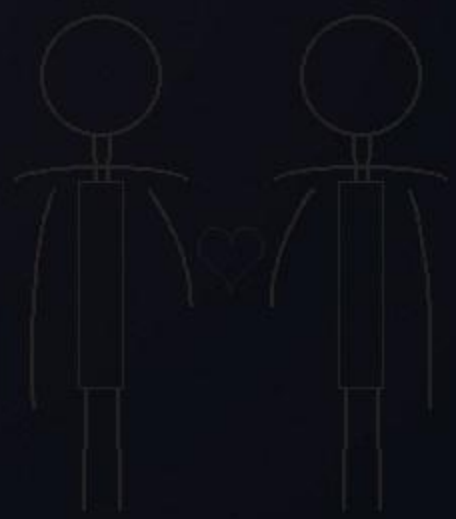
SHAME

Shame Needs Darkness to Survive.

The moment you say the thing out loud — the thing you've carried silently — its grip begins to loosen. That's not an accident.

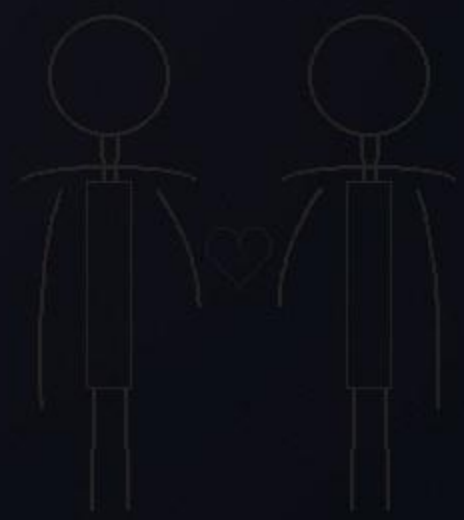
Shame is the fear of disconnection.

It says: 'If they really knew me, they would leave.' It thrives in silence, in secrecy, in the belief that you are fundamentally different from everyone else in the worst possible way.



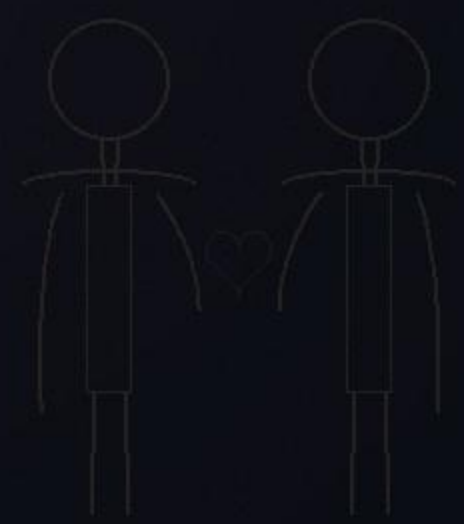
Light is the antidote.

Research shows that shame loses power when it meets empathy. Not agreement. Not flattery. Just: 'I hear you, I see you, and you are not alone in this.' That is the work of good therapy.



You are not your worst chapter.

Whatever is in you that you haven't said — it can be held. It can be met with grace. In this practice, nothing you bring is too heavy. Nothing makes you less worthy of care.



You don't have to carry shame alone.

DM 'SAFE' if you've been carrying something you've never said out loud.
