Boundaries Are Not Walls.

A wall keeps everyone out. A boundary defines where you end and someone else begins — and it's one of the most loving things you can build.

Boundaries protect relationships.

When you don't have them, resentment fills the space. When you finally name them, relationships either grow or reveal they were built on you having none. Either outcome is important information.

You can set a boundary with kindness.

Limits don't require anger. They don't require a lengthy explanation. 'I won't be available for that' is a complete sentence. You can love someone and still not give them unlimited access to you.

Faith doesn't erase the need for limits.

Serving others doesn't mean having no self. Jesus withdrew. He rested. He said no. Healthy limits are part of sustainable love — for others and for yourself.

Limits are an act of love.

Save this if you've been struggling to say no.
