5 Therapy Myths — Debunked

Let me clear some things up. Because the myths around therapy are keeping good people from getting real help.

Myth 1: Therapy is only for crisis.

Therapy is for anyone who wants to grow, heal, understand themselves better, or build healthier relationships. You don't have to be at rock bottom to begin. You just have to want more.

Myth 2: Faith and therapy conflict.

They don't. Faith-based therapy integrates clinical tools with your spiritual values. You can bring God into the room. You can't fully heal if you leave part of yourself at the door.

Myth 3: Therapy is just venting.

Therapy is structured, evidence-based, and goal-oriented. A good therapist challenges you — gently, skillfully, with your growth in mind. It's collaborative.

Myth 4: You should handle it alone.

Humans are wired for connection. We are not meant to process pain in isolation. Asking for help isn't weakness — it's wisdom. And it's exactly what Scripture calls us to do for one another.

Myth 5: Talking about it makes it worse.

Research consistently shows the opposite. Naming and processing our experiences in a safe relationship reduces distress. Silence is often where pain compounds.

Therapy is for anyone ready to grow.

DM 'MYTHS' if you have questions about starting therapy.