THERAPIST TALK

What I Wish More People Knew About Therapy

After years in this work, a few things stand out that I wish I could say to every person who's ever hesitated to begin.

You don't have to be ready.

Most people who start therapy aren't 'ready.' They're scared, doubtful, or unsure it will help. You don't need readiness. You just need willingness. That's enough.

Progress isn't always visible.

Some sessions feel like nothing happened. Then a week later, you handle something differently. That's the work — slow, beneath the surface, genuinely changing how you move through life.

The relationship is the medicine.

Research consistently shows the therapeutic alliance — how safe and understood you feel with your therapist — is the most powerful predictor of growth. The connection is the point.

You don't have to be ready. Just willing.

DM 'START' if you've been thinking about beginning therapy.
