The Most Rewarding Part of This Work

It's not having the right answer. It's the moment someone's shoulders drop and they say, 'I never thought I'd feel this way again.'

I get to witness the turn.

There's a specific shift that happens in a session — eyes soften, breath deepens, a long-held thing finally gets named. That moment is why I do this work.

Healing is slower than we want.

It rarely happens in one session. But it does happen. Week after week, session after session — something that felt permanent starts to move. And that is profound.

Every person deserves a safe place.

That's not a tagline for me. It's a conviction. I became a therapist because I believe in what happens when someone finally feels truly seen and heard.

Everyone deserves a safe place.

Follow for faith-based mental health content every week.